Heat transfer is one of the most important and most common engineering disciplines in food processing. There are many unit operations in the food industry where steady or unsteady state heat transfer is taking place e.g. sterilization, dehydration, freezing etc. Heat transfer in these operations is of primary importance and affects the food products. That is done by applying some of the methods suggested in the literature. 2. Methods . 2.1 Thermal properties of food . Knowledge of the thermal properties of food is required in order to evaluate the heat transfer in food products. Therefore, a composition-based prediction method was used to obtain the thermal properties of food. The thermal properties are associated with the heat transfer operations of food processing. Heat transfer involves the transfer of heat into or out of a food. There are three ways that heat can be transferred: by radiation, conduction, or convection. Radiation is the transfer of heat by electromagnetic waves (e.g., in a microwave oven).
